The Elements of an Australian Coastal Garden

There are several key elements that define an Australian coastal garden:

- Native plants: Diana Somerville's gardens are filled with native Australian plants, which are well-adapted to the coastal environment. These plants are drought-tolerant, salt-tolerant, and wind-resistant.

- Sustainable design: Somerville's gardens are designed to be sustainable, with a focus on water conservation and reduced environmental impact. She uses techniques such as rainwater harvesting, mulching, and composting.
- Natural materials: Somerville uses natural materials such as stone, wood, and sand in her gardens. These materials help to create a sense of place and harmony with the surrounding environment.
- Simple forms: Somerville's gardens are characterized by simple forms and clean lines. She avoids clutter and unnecessary ornamentation, instead focusing on the beauty of the natural materials and plants.
- Coastal influences: Somerville's gardens are often influenced by the coastal environment, with features such as beachside boardwalks, driftwood sculptures, and wind-blown grasses.

Creating Your Own Australian Coastal Garden

If you are inspired to create your own Australian coastal garden, here are a few tips:

- Choose the right plants: Select plants that are native to your coastal area and well-adapted to the conditions. Consider factors such as drought tolerance, salt tolerance, and wind resistance.
- Use sustainable design principles: Incorporate sustainable design techniques such as rainwater harvesting, mulching, and composting.
- Use natural materials: Stick to natural materials such as stone, wood, and sand when choosing hardscaping and other elements for your garden.

- Keep it simple: Avoid clutter and unnecessary ornamentation. Instead, focus on the beauty of the natural materials and plants.
- Embrace the coastal influences: Take cues from the coastal environment when designing your garden. Incorporate features such as beachside boardwalks, driftwood sculptures, and wind-blown grasses.

Diana Somerville's Australian coastal gardens are a beautiful and sustainable expression of her passion for native plants and coastal living. By following her lead, you can create your own backyard paradise that is in harmony with the natural environment.
