A Long SEO Title

Norylska Nickel, the world's largest producer of palladium and nickel, is facing a growing number of challenges. The company has been accused of environmental damage, human rights abuses, and corruption. In recent months, the company has also been hit by a series of accidents, including a major oil spill in the Arctic.

In a recent article for The Moscow Times, Michael Fletcher argues that Norylska Nickel is a "groaning giant." The company is struggling to cope with the weight of its own problems, and it is unclear whether it will be able to survive in its current form.

Fletcher begins his article by describing the environmental damage caused by Norylska Nickel's operations. The company's mines and smelters have polluted the air, water, and soil in the Arctic. The pollution has caused respiratory problems, cancer, and other health problems for the people who live in the region.

Fletcher also accuses Norylska Nickel of human rights abuses. The company has been accused of using forced labor and paying its workers poverty wages. The company has also been accused of suppressing dissent and silencing its critics.

In addition to its environmental and human rights problems, Norylska Nickel is also facing a number of financial challenges. The company's debt has been rising in recent years, and its profits have been declining. The company is also facing a number of lawsuits, including a class action lawsuit filed by shareholders who allege that the company misled them about its environmental practices.

Fletcher argues that Norylska Nickel is a "groaning giant" that is struggling to survive. The company is facing a number of challenges, and it is unclear whether it will be able to overcome them.
