Rivera was born in Mexico and came to the United States with his family when he was a child. He grew up in Los Angeles and attended the University of California, Los Angeles, where he studied film and television production. After graduating from UCLA, Rivera worked as a writer and producer on a number of television shows, including "The George Lopez Show" and "Ugly Betty."

In 2013, Rivera created the web series "Undocumented," which follows the lives of three undocumented immigrants living in Los Angeles. The series was praised for its honest and authentic portrayal of the undocumented experience. "Undocumented" has been viewed over 20 million times online and has won numerous awards, including a Peabody Award.

In addition to his work on "Undocumented," Rivera has also directed several short films and documentaries about the undocumented experience. His work has been featured in a number of museums and galleries, including the Smithsonian National Museum of American History and the Museum of Contemporary Art in Los Angeles.

Rivera's work is important because it gives a voice to the millions of undocumented immigrants living in the United States. His work challenges stereotypes and misconceptions about undocumented immigrants and shows the human side of the immigration debate. Rivera's work is a powerful reminder that undocumented immigrants are not criminals or a threat to society. They are human beings who are simply trying to build a better life for themselves and their families.

The Power of Representation

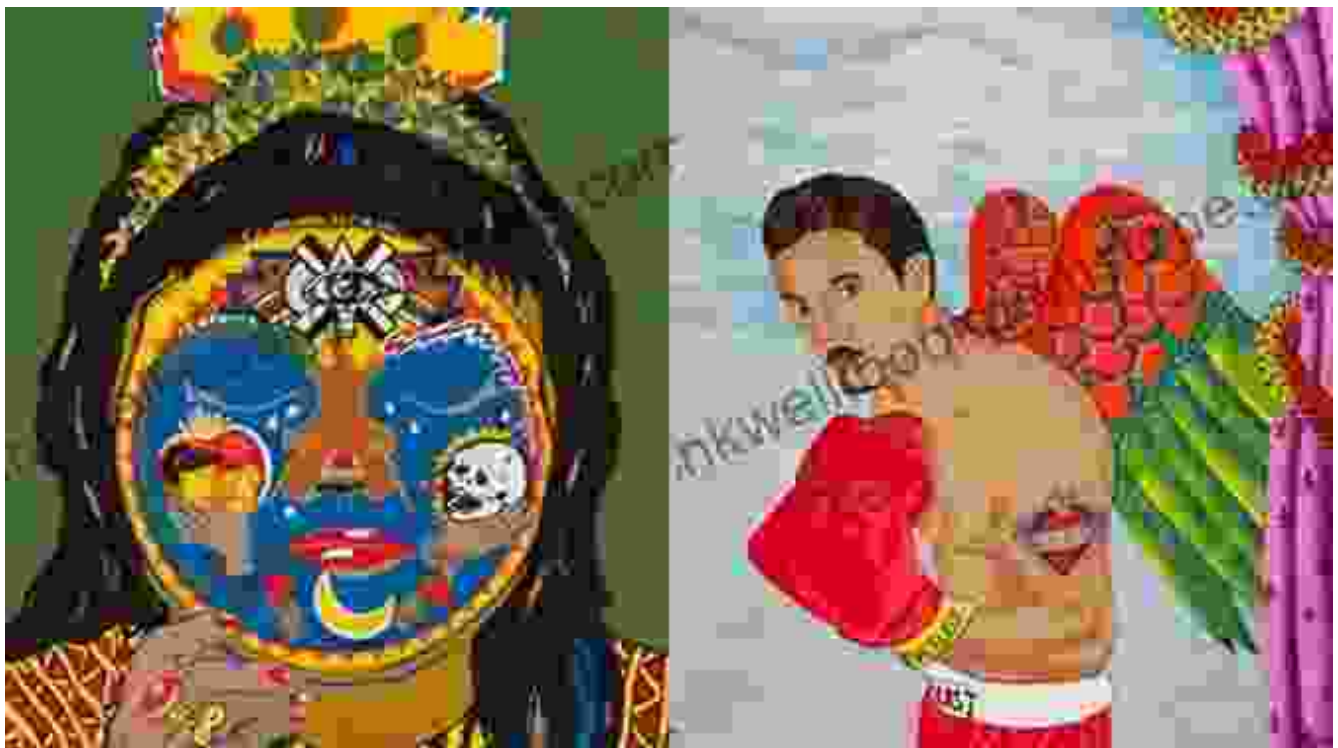

Representation is important for a number of reasons. It allows people to see themselves reflected in the media and culture they consume. This can help to build self-esteem and a sense of belonging. Representation can also help to challenge stereotypes and misconceptions about different groups of people.

For undocumented immigrants, representation is especially important. Undocumented immigrants are often marginalized and excluded from mainstream society. They are often invisible in the media and culture, and their stories are rarely told. This can make it difficult for undocumented immigrants to feel like they belong and can lead to feelings of isolation and loneliness.

Rivera's work is important because it provides representation for undocumented immigrants. His work shows the human side of the immigration debate and challenges stereotypes about undocumented immigrants. Rivera's work helps to create a more inclusive and welcoming society for all.

John Michael Rivera is an important artist whose work is making a difference in the lives of undocumented immigrants. His work is a powerful reminder that undocumented immigrants are not criminals or a threat to society. They are human beings who are simply trying to build a better life for themselves and their families. Rivera's work is helping to create a more inclusive and welcoming society for all.
